One sure way to lose the man you're working on is to expect him to take you to dinner constantly at the most exclusive and expensive restaurants in town.

Today's economy being what it is, he may be having a difficult enough time keeping you in cocktails. I heard one American woman brag that she's never been seen in any but the finest restaurants and cocktail lounges in town.

She's usually alone or with some other dried-up old hag. Women with this kind of attitude usually wind up single, and so old you can't see them for the dust of age. Then they write me nasty letters.

On beer wallets, how much file can you expect today's man-about-town to feed you by candlelight and five waiters?

Be sensible. Be grateful that one is even asking you out. Surprise him one evening and say, "Let's not have a big dinner tonight. Just a simple little old hot dog or bowl of chili will do." This will make an impression.

When he does think enough of you to wine and dine you splendidly for one evening, understand that for two weeks afterward he's probably smoking his cigarettes down to nothing—because he's broke.

If you're seriously working on him as husband material, then it's your job to help him over the financial humps.

Another idea to help cut his expenses: When he calls to escort you on that food binge, have a bottle and mix ready. No woman is ever ready on time. He can keep busy—and reduce the bar bill later—by mixing cocktails to pass the time away.

A little understanding goes a long way. A little sense about spending his money can add itself up into a nice down payment on your engagement ring.

Warning: If men entertain you frequently at expensive night spots on expense accounts, watch your step lest you get trapped flat. They are usually married.

Expense accounts were created by big business to act as escape valves for too-married men to blow their tops away from home.

So beware! Neither good food nor marriage is what they're after.

County Committee Will Study Hahn Aid Proposal

Supervisor Kenneth Hahn's jurisdiction to call direct when he needs help."

proposal for a single county-wide emergency telephone number is set for study by a voluntary inter-governmental cooperation Fire Committee. The committee, now being formed, will include representatives from small cities in the country. It will discuss the need for such a number first.

Hahn announced this week that he will ask the Board of Supervisors to refer the proposal to the new committee at its meeting next Tuesday.

Citing the fact that many of the 74 cities in the country have their own police and fire departments, Hahn said, "it's no wonder that the average citizen does not know what

THE PROBLEM can be solved, asserts Hahn, by a single telephone number which would reach trained dispatchers. The dispatchers could send aid quickly and directly to the scene.

Telephone company executives have backed the proposal, Hahn said.
